There is perhaps no place where courage is more needed than in the home life by the tired housewife and busy mother. Her daily work is but a repetition of many a yesterday. She is but human and must sometimes feel worn and discouraged, but a quiet confidence that we shall be able to perform whatever is right and necessary generally carries us safely through difficulties, keeping us strong and calm amid the most trying duties. No one fills a place of greater responsibility, nor one more worthy of the highest honors than the faithful mother and housekeeper who loves work and acts on the principle that it is not what we do but how, that makes us great. Hor example is worthy of imitation by the noblest of earth. There is nothing more beautiful in life than the brave spirit who thus lovingly performs her part of the labors of earth, asking no greater reward than that the consciousness of having done her duty well and led her household to Christ. Priceless indeed must be the peace that fills her heart in the hour of death, and endless rest awaits the tired hands when life is done.
